It was a noble exercise in political correctness, in the name of ensuring that everyone was treated equally and fairly. That is, until a mention of the Queen Mother's name was raised in the Lords. The Archbishop of Canterbury, Lord Carey, began by saying that the Mother of the King had been a "splendid woman". His Lordship then appeared to realise that he might be doing something that might be construed as a slight on a member of the royal family. He hastily withdrew his comment, explaining that he had meant no slight. During the debate, a number of Lords mentioned the fact that the Queen Mother had visited a mental hospital before her death. That visit, which became public knowledge only in 2014, was originally kept secret. It was not the first time that the Duke of Windsor's stance on the monarchy and his abhorrence of the institution had been brought to light. In the run-up to the 1951 general election, he had refused to appear in any public forum where he was likely to be asked about his views, leading to speculation that he had adopted an 11th hour change of heart and was becoming an advocate of the monarchy. Some commentators felt that the one-sided, one-sided coverage of that election in the media was partly motivated by an expectation that the public would vote in a way that would be favourable to the Queen. The Duke was privately seen as an embarrassment by the authorities at the time. There is a story of the Duke, allegedly drunk and with a gun in his hand, threatening to shoot the prime minister. There are other examples of his supposedly being difficult to control. The Duke of Windsor eventually decided that he would not be allowed to continue in 82157476af
